“There are too many cases where individuals convicted of serious and violent crimes are serving conditional sentences. Criminals who commit these crimes should be punished appropriately and serve time in prison. By restricting these crimes from conditional sentencing eligibility, Canadians will have a justice system that imposes sentences that fit the severity of the crime, that properly deter others from committing serious offences and, most important, promotes safe streets and safe communities.”

“Our government believes, as do many Canadians, that young people who commit serious, violent crimes must receive a sentence proportionate to the crime and the degree of their responsibility. Our system must effectively hold young offenders accountable with meaningful consequences while also instilling within them a sense of responsibility for their delinquent or criminal behaviour.”

Honourable Rob Nicholson, P.C., M.P.
Minister of Justice
